AROUND THE AIRPORT

Runways Get Hot as CAA Fliers Start Growing Wings

Albert Whitted airport is taking on all the aspects of a taxi stand these days, with 29 college students training under the CAA program taking off and landing as if there weren't a minute to be lost.

Already these youths have sprouted a good growth of "fuzz" which will develop into full-sized wings in September after three months of coaching by Instructors Otis Beard, Jimmie Johnstone and Matt Pelling.

One of the strangest things about this flight training program paid for by the federal government and sponsored through the St. Petersburg Junior college, is that a majority of the students do not attend the Junior college.

Only 12 of the 29 actually attend the local institution, the other 17 singing alma maters from eight different schools. Here is the way they stack up: St. Petersburg Junior college, 12; University of Florida, 9; University of Virginia, 2, and one each from University of Pittsburgh, Louisiana State university and University of North Carolina.

The group began with 30 members, but one student was "washed up" after two and one-half hours of dual instruction proved to Otis Beard that the student did not have a certain "sixth sense" which is necessary for good fliers.

Some of the students declare their stomachs have a path worn to their mouths from doing so many stalls and steep banks.

An indication as to how well the CAA students like to fly is given by the fact that the entire class has forfeited Fourth of July as a holiday, so each man can get in 30 minutes of flying time.

L. R. Ash of Fayetteville, N. C., until three months ago, is one of the latest to join the group who swap yarns at the airport. He might well be called the "Flying Bondolier," since as a bond salesman he does all his traveling by airplane, which he pilots himself.
